It's A Wise Parent

A Common Sense Approach to Your Child

By Janice Coe

Dear Miss Coe,

I'm a father with a problem. My daughter wants to major in math or science in high school. She's a bright girl but she's pretty too. That means that she'll probably get married young.

What good will math and science do her when she's a housewife and mother?

Please don't think I'm narrow minded, but my wife went to college, and she hates everything about house-keeping. It gets on her nerves and wears her out. But anything outside, like club activities she does with pleasure. I think she was educated away from the household duties that are the lot of most women, instead of toward them.

Should I let my daughter fall into the same trap? Puzzled Parent

Dear Puzzled,

You are more of a puzzled husband than a puzzled parent!

Don't get your daughter's interests mixed up with your wife's indifference as a homemaker. No woman, whether college educated or not, really loves housework. Few use their schooling as an excuse for getting out of it. Yet your daughter major in math and science . . . but help her learn that the scientific method can be used in the kitchen too.

An orderly, organized mind organizes work so there's plenty of time for fun and creativity too.

Especially if she marries early, your child will need a good education and career training. Women today are marrying young, having their children young, and are still youthful when the kids are grown and gone. Those are the years when she'll bless you for letting her have training that she can always use.

As for Mama . . . a lot of women seek appreciation and attention in club work that they're not getting at home. Try a little praise . . . and tenderness!

Attention parents . . . If you have a problem, write to Janice Coe, Torrance Press, 1406 Cravens Ave., Torrance.
